

Low effort response to Polk :3

I was mentioned in Polk's 21st Stumpside Chat article (read here) and thus feel inclined to make a response. This is mostly out of boredom, bleh.

Polk used this article to touch on the old "White Pagan vs Brown Xtian Europe?" debate that's basically a copypasta at this point, as well as touching on an argument about systems that myself & ElectionMaps had a while back.

Firstly, I think Polk misunderstands the purpose of the first argument. I don't blame him at all, as the true intent & intellectual abilities of the person saying this varies greatly. Someone like Sect saying this is obviously different from when it comes out of more abrasive personalities like Phobophile. These sorts of things get muddled after a while.

"The goal of the question is obviously to try and get Christians to answer "Brown Christian Europe" because Pagans say this would prove that they are not loyal to the White race or something."

For the bulk of the non-Xtian Right doesn't necessarily use this as an argument but instead as a loyalty test. The answer we look for isn't "Brown Christian Europe", the answer is roughly "I would prefer White Christian but given the choices I would settle for White Pagan temporarily." It is to see whether this individual is actually useful or whether they're going to cling to their religious nonsense when it comes down to it. Meaning, would they vote for a non-Christian president that will reverse demographic change or a TradCath president that will let in a million Mexican Catholics.

This may seem like another false dichotomy, but it's important due to the implications. It's not necessarily about paganism (pagans don't care if other people are pagan or not, belief is irrelevant in their theology), it's about putting the most issue (race) first and foremost & leaving other arguments about religion or ideology to be dealt with afterwards. Although it's not very well understood by many Christians online (not necessarily Polk specifically, just in general), religion is either a secondary issue or completely unimportant to the vast majority of people. Just like how very few people spend any significant amount of time thinking about politics, regardless of how significant it is or claims to be.

The only issue of any immediate importance is race because anything else can be undone. Ideology, economics, religion, etc. will always shift with time & often do so very easily. The racial make up of White/formerly White countries are very difficult to fix, especially when effective solutions get bogged down by pointless moralism from religious types. Thus the point of the question isn't to be a catch 22, but rather test whether the person you're asking is more concerned with real issues or their own petty values.

I bring this up because Polk himself also believes this:

I rarely take part in these sorts of things because I think they're retarded. We can duke it out over religious quarrels once we have stayed off Total Demographic Collapse and Total Latinx Replacement. You're just retarded if you're engaging in this sort of thing right now.

I'll agree that this sort of thing is generally divisive & in poor faith, at least on iFunny. It generally comes from the more militant types like Phobophile. But something to note is that it's rarely aimed at people like Polk or other generally respectable Christians. As I said earlier, the desire for everyone else to share your religion is almost exclusively an Abrahamic trait & pagans generally don't care. The more noteworthy in the pagan sphere like Cole Wolfsson are well aware that paganism is niche & have no issue with that.

Further on that, the religious squabbles virtually always start with Christians. I know this because I watched what was essentially the birth of modern RW paganism (excluding the couple niche examples from the 80's in the post-New Age zeitgeist) on IronMarch from back in 2015. I then followed that development online to today. There were a few generally nonreligious thinkers on the Right, but at this point the consensus was overwhelmingly that "RW = Christian" to some extent.

From that point where people first started leaving Christianity, there really wasn't much conflict as most people on IronMarch & /pol/ understood that real issues took precedence over personal beliefs. We already had those sorts of conflicts over ideology (NS vs Racist Liberalism, Movement vs Militancy, etc.) and knew that such petty nonsense get us no where.

The very first I ever saw of the modern pagan/xtian conflict started online in roughly the 2017-2018 timeframe, and it was not started by pagans. This was the era where Nick Fuentes type TradCaths & other brownoids who wanted to LARP as RW started becoming popular. It wasn't pagans that started such arguments, it was people like Zaoist. Everything since has just been a game of tit for tat where both groups keep trying to annoy each other.

I should clarify I don't want to implicate Polk in this btw, I didn't know of him until I joined Substack & I believe he's a protestant which have (in my experience) been far less abrasive in these matters & are more concerned with apologetics. They're capable of nuance in a way that Catholics aren't (symptom of being overwhelmingly of Germanic blood btw). Prots & other more respectable Christians will often catch strays, often from the retarded caste of our camp, but generally don't fall into the type of stuff we take issue with. Pagan issues with Christianity, beyond metaphysics & other disagreements, is generally with the trend of Christians spreading anti-White messaging & facilitating migration. Catholicism, as a defined organization, has no defense but obviously people like Polk are at full liberty to not support the actions of religious organizations that they aren't connected to across denominations & such.

Ultimately, I think Polk is just missing the nuance of the question which, again, is fair as it gets muddled by different people using it for different reasons. One thing I will disagree with him on is this:

"The most common is for Christians to just say "White Christian Europe" and this is probably the second best option. Most of the Pagans get mad that the Christian is refusing to play ball, but the Christian is doing the best possible thing in this scenario."

If any of my Christian readers find themselves in this sort of argument, don't do this. It makes you look like a retard that's incapable of understanding a dichotomy, "But I did have breakfast this morning?" The point of the argument obviously isn't to pick between two unlikely extremes, it's just to test your loyalty. Obviously most Prots like Polk himself would prefer a White Christian Europe, but when it comes down to it will he support a dedicated WN cause even if it's secular/pagan or will he side with an anti-White coalition that happens to include Christians? The point is to extrapolate bigger things from the answer, not the answer itself. Obviously, I doubt Polk would fall into the Nick Fuentes crowd if it came down to it purely because their religious nationalists, but not everyone shares that nuance & many will follow that logic to the point of becoming openly anti-White.

Overall, I think Polk is missing the fact that he isn't really the main target of this argument. It's people like Nick Fuentes that like to LARP as being radical RW thinkers & outwardly say they would rather have a Mexican Christian than a White non-Christian because they make their religious beliefs their primary identity & lose any sense of nuance.

The latter half of his post is on the question of whether the purpose of a system is what it does. I already stated my beliefs in the note that's attached in Polk's article, so I won't bother reiterating.

"I'm sure this argument is fine and dandy in it's original context of robotics, but it really falls apart when you introduce it into an environment of living beings, especially humans. Functionalism like this doesn't really work with humans. Humans form intent, and their intent is what determines their actions."

What I will say is that intent is irrelevant. No one really cares about intent at the end of the day, good intentions paved the road to hell or something. What people care about is the outcome. If I shoot at a tree & end up nailing some dude standing next to it, it really doesn't matter that I didn't intend to shoot him. Similarly, plastics were never intended to cause a massive ecological crisis but that's what happened regardless. Humans can form whatever intent, belief, or other abstraction to justify themselves but it's ultimately irrelevant.

The reason we can say that a function of Western governments is to import brownoids is because that's exactly what's happening & they resist efforts to stop it. The same thing can be said about the Catholic Church, which has a history of promoting race mixing & assisting migrants.

I will agree that this may not hold up for Christianity as a whole, which is fairly abstract & often loosely defined compared to the institutionalized Catholic & Orthovro Churches.

Regardless, judging things off their original purpose or creator's intent is ultimately just a waste of time. I admire the original intent the Founders of the US had, and yet I can still recognize that the US needs to disappear because of its effects. This sort of thinking is ultimately nothing more than a time waster that inhibits making real change by striking down harmful institutions & the like.

Christians themselves shouldn't fall into this trap, as it can easily be applied to any sect that starts treading into outright heresy. I doubt Polk, or most other Christians, would care to defend those weird woke churches that hang pride flags purely because they were originally created as upstanding institutions. Similarly, we shouldn't judge the actions of current major sects off of what they were meant to be or used to be. We can only judge based on what they are currently doing.

No intellectually inclined RW pagan would have any issue with the old stock Southern Baptists, who were often at the forefront of defending Southern Whites & formed the nuclei of most communities in Dixie. That doesn't stop us from criticizing the current state of these institutions for being pozzed.

Lastly, Polk refers to me in his article as a pagan. This is false, I'm an apathetic agnostic at best. I get lumped into the pagan crowd because I usually have similar criticisms of Christianity & post things with pagan aesthetics, but only as a cultural thing like most other NatSoecs.

It's a shame the question has become so misused, I always found it helpful for discourse and establishing prioritizes. Such is the time we live in.

I stand by my Pagan brothers in blood, even though we are not brothers in Christ, because God the father. Almighty; has commanded man not only stand tall and proud with his kin, but to wage war upon others— even Christians upon the institution of Kindship.

I do not judge my Pagan brothers for judging the decadence of the church harshly, fore the church will be judged by God even harsher. Fear not my brothers, in the end, you will be under the dominion and love of Christ and eternal life shall reign.

With that being said: hail Cesar!
